Channel Catfish

Bluegill

LARGEMOUTH BASS

The large mouth bass is one of the most popular freshwater game fish. Much of its popularity is due to its aggressive attitude and willingness to strike a lure or bait with explosive force. They will strike almost any kind of artificial lure or live bait, but most are taken on plastic worms, surface plugs, spinnerbaits, crankbaits, bass bugs and shiner minnows.

CHANNEL CATFISH

The channel catfish is an opportunistic omnivore, gorging itself on nearly any form of living or dead material. They will take nearly any kind of bait, and on occasion a spinner or crankbait. However, big channel catfish eat almost nothing but fish.

Contrary to popular belief, it is the spines on the dorsal and pectoral fins that sting. The whiskers are harmless. But if you do get poked with a spine there is an effective folk remedy. Simply rub the fish's belly on the wound.

BLUEGILL

Bluegill are relatively easy to catch, especially if you are using the proper tackle, bait and technique. An ultra-light rod and reel with light line will allow you to feel the bluegill's bite more effectively and you will catch more fish. In clear water, light line is less likely to be detected by fish. Line weights from 2 to 6 lb. test work best. Hooks with long shanks will allow you to more easily remove them from the bluegill's tiny mouth and thin wire hooks work best for holding small baits. Live bait works especially well for blue gill. The most common baits are worms and night crawlers because they are readily available and bluegill love'em. The key is to use only a piece of a worm - just enough to cover the hook (keeping it small - remember!). Other productive baits include crickets, grasshoppers, red wigglers and meal worms.
